Not illustrated. 1844 Excerpt: ...of manner to him; but now that my whole soul was bent on finding out who the person was to whom my uncle hoped that Edward would devote himself, every other consideration gave way before that overwhelming interest. I could not have imagined beforehand to what a degree it would have harassed me. I feltas if the time that was to intervene between that evening and the next would be interminable; the images of Henry, of Alice, of Mrs. Tracy, faded away before the phantom which my imagination had conjured up, and it was with feverish impatience that I awaited the approach of that hour which I thought would confirm or dispel my fears. lt came at last, as all hours do, whether they have been longed for with all'the intensity of ardent expectation, or dreaded with all the anguish of terrified apprehension. When I came down to the drawing-room, dressed for the ball, Mrs. Middleton exclaimed, " You look unlike yourself to--night, Ellen! Have you done your hair differently from usual? No (she continued, as she passed her hand gently over my forehead)--no, it is not that; I can't make it out: that darling face of yours changes often enough from sunshine to clouds, and from clouds to sunshine; but I never saw it look just like to-night." I kissed her fondly, but said with some impatience, " Let us go--we are very late." ' We went accordingly, and my uncle with us. When we entered the room, it was crowded to suffocation, and we made our way with difficulty to t ne seats, near which Mrs. Miltown and Mrs. Brandon were. Henry was talking to. the latter when we came up t0 them; he gave me his chair, and ensconced himself in a cornel' behind us. I felt that Mr. Middleton's-eye was upon me, andl entered into conversation in the m...
