The National Gallery Diary: London

The National Gallery Diary: London
The theme for the National Gallery's 2002 diary is the subject of faces. Faces are everywhere in the National Gallery's collection, in portraits and within narrative scenes and paintings of everyday life. Each weekly spread is illustrated in full colour, focusing on a single face within a painting (Ghirlandaio's gentle and innocent "Portrait of a Girl", for instance, or Durer's sensitive and dignified "The Painter's Father") or on a group of faces taken from several paintings and themed by subject. Amongst the many subjects covered in the book are children from different centuries, self-portraits of artists, old age and famous historical figures. Individual facial features are also shown: a succession of profiles from wide varying paintings is revealing, contrasting noses of all shapes and sizes, and a sequence of eloquent and expressive eyes communicates a surprising variety of emotions. The diary also gives the dates of all the National Gallery exhibitions as well as national and international holidays, religious holidays and astronomical information.
