Haggard Hawk: A Nathan Hawk Murder Mystery (The Nathan Hawk Murder Mysteries) Douglas Watkinson
Dear Reader, I used to be a high-ranking English copper until my temper got the better of me and I broke a fellow officer's jaw. I was 'required to retire' as the British police so delicately put it. I should've learned from the experience but no, I still blow the odd fuse or ten. When my wife was alive she used to rein me in, but since her death there's been no one to do that. I've got four grown up kids, by the way, who live thousands of miles away - Nepal, Japan, Haiti and Los Angeles. They're all impetuous by nature and they worry me, usually with good reason. Thanks to modern technology it often feels like they're in the same room with me. Is that good or bad? I'm not sure... When I first came to live in this truly beautiful English village I thought early retirement would be a breeze. Wrong! But, as you'll see, just as I was about to go mad with boredom a neighbour did me the courtesy of being murdered and suddenly it was like the old days. Without the paperwork. Without rules. Without a boss telling me to be careful. Regards, Hawk Haggard Hawk is the first in this modern murder mystery in the classic English style. Hawk is a witty and volcanic English ex-copper with four grown up children scattered across the world. He was 'required to retire', as the British so delicately put it. In truth he was sacked. And just as he's about to go mad with boredom one of his neighbours does him the courtesy of being murdered. The local police warn Hawk against interfering in their inquiry, but he can't help himself and pretty soon he's back where he belongs – catching a killer.
