Excerpt

"John," Lord Mathetes shook his head, "do you believe that if Michael had just answered your question with a simple word that you would have walked out of that bookstore satisfied with a deep life-changing knowledge of the truth--knowledge that you were loved and cared about?"

"Well..." John hesitated as the question caught him off guard. I didn't even consider the impact or lack of impact a simple answer would have had. I assumed it would be enough, but would it really? I've heard before that God cares about me. Matthew preaches about it all the time, and it doesn't change me. Could Michael have said anything--anything at all--that would have made the slightest bit of difference? If I am honest, no.

"To see, to know that one is loved and cared about cannot be expressed in simple words. Oh sure, people try and some get a glimpse or a hint of truth, love, and care, but to truly know, one must hunt it and find it by experiencing it. The love that you seek to know about is bigger than you or any one of us or all of us put together. To know that kind of love, one must seek it on a grander scale--a quest-style scale--and that could never simply be put into words." Lord Mathetes paused for a moment. "That experience you had a moment ago, you remember how it felt?"
